creates from his ideological imagination a figure which is much less complex than the reality. Johnson appears unfamiliar with the Pope's extensive writings before his election, a glaring omission in light of the Pope's highly nuanced philosophy of Thomistic personalism. Most of Johnson's sources are secondary, and themselves popular rather than scholarly. Even in his treatment of the Pope's speeches and encyclicals, since his election, Johnson is highly selective, choosing not to dwell at any length on the Pope's pleading for the poor.

The jacket of this book describes it as a work "not only for Catholics — both clergy and laity — but also for everyone concerned with the institution of the church in our time." The word "institution" deserves highlighting. For Paul Johnson, Catholicism is and must be inflexible, unyielding, and always everywhere the same. No concept here of the church as community, herald, servant, or sacrament. Paul Johnson's church is an institution, and an autocratic one at that. But what does Paul Johnson's church have to do with Jesus Christ? •
